Need Finding(Design Problem)

I like group projects as much as any other person as it allows the division of work in such a large scale project. But this comes with the risk of having an uncoordinated and irresponsible group. In my group, I believe everyone had a fair share of work and it was very helpful to have a group to work with this quarantine. At first I thought it would be difficult to work in a group this quarantine mostly because of useless groupmates, but the group I landed with right now seems to be good and none of us is slacking. At first I found it difficult to communicate with my group mates due to internet connection and social anxiety that I developed during quarantine, but it seems to have settled down after a while since im talking with my friends/classmates that I interacted with before quarantine. I was certainly lucky to have good group members instead of really terrible ones.

Most of my problems with the group projects are the distribution of work. In the first week of being a group no one took the mantle or leader, which led to a cramming of the activities given. The generation of ideas which happened in the first week of being grouped was certainly enjoyable with a fair share of its open mindedness and critical thinking on the ideas given. Just like every other group we have our ups and downs, our good cooperation and presentation style and down being our bad ideas and cramming of works.

Overall, working with my group has been a fun learning experience. Everyone seems to have equal responsibility with the activities provided and I am also learning enough in terms of the subject. I find working in my group workable and a nice experience despite the limited online interaction. I think all of us can work together efficiently and be able to generate good ideas and projects
